This work deals with melancholy derived from indirect experiences through media. In the collective memory formed through cultural artifacts such as movies, music, and news, layers of longing for an unreal state and a sense of loss are deeply embedded. Particularly, fragments of expressions (eyes, mouth) captured in movies and news are left on the screen and canvas like afterimages, blending into the moving scenes. This screen (canvas) visualizes the process of constructing and deconstructing social and psychological structures. Within the gap between the ideals and realities produced by the media, this work aims to reveal modern melancholy (ersatz melancholy).

Forking scenes, dragging voices

2025, sound(ambisonic audio, 3 wireless headphones, hi-fi audio player, mixer, wireless audio transmitter

Link: <https://vimeo.com/1162091277>

This work spatializes the manufactured melancholy that media produces—an ersatz melancholy. By filling the void left when the visual image is removed with ambisonic sound, it tests how mediated, secondhand experience transfers into bodily sensation. Wearing headphones, the visitor enters the gallery and walks among scattered voices and media fragments that seem to emanate from specific points in space. These three-dimensionally designed sounds summon memories never lived into the present space, and in the gaps of that hollow sound the visitor confronts a fictive nostalgia that media has instilled. When the rift between illusion and the reality it has severed from remains as nothing but unseen sound, we are left asking what it is we truly long for.

Dazzling Whispers, strumming Stars explores the interplay between reality and ideal by letting image and sound collide. The video uses contrasting visuals (black-and-white vs. color, low vs. high resolution) to express a non-linear emotional state. The sound creates new spatial depth and uses abrupt rhythmic changes within a gentle flow to immerse the audience. Artist Daum Kim visualizes inexplicable everyday feelings through fragmented media, highlighting the sense of renewal found in daily life despite repeated struggles.

Rubbing Lines, 2024, 4K video, stereo sound, 7: 17 minutes, link : <https://vimeo.com/1021369547>

This video work explores the process by which personal pain expands into a social presence, through a conversation between a feverish child and their parent. Set against the backdrop of the COVID pandemic, the child's body temperature becomes a catalyst that transforms a private bedroom into a space of social management, as the parent too comes to experience—bodily—the constraints that lie beyond that threshold. The symbolic invocations of chemical measurements and medication reveal that individual suffering is embedded within a complex chain entangled with public resources, histories, and infrastructures. The COVID-19 pandemic was an unprecedented case in which big data and AI technologies intervened deeply in actual lives before their social impact had been sufficiently verified. Contact tracing, quarantine determinations, and infection prediction algorithms converted personal bodily information into social data in real time, under the banner of public health. The work fixes its gaze on precisely this moment—how the most private of bodily symptoms, a child's fever, comes to be absorbed into the circuits of state and technological control.

Liminal
2022, Multi-Channel Video and Sound (Monitor, Media Player, Fluorescent Light, Speaker, Subwoofer), Dimensions variable
link : <https://vimeo.com/737106930>

This work begins with an internet culture that shares and memefies images of "liminal spaces"—in-between spaces that feel familiar yet unsettling. Empty corridors, deserted swimming pools, carpeted hallways under fluorescent lights: these images spread rapidly online as a collective language of anxiety. Rather than consuming this phenomenon as mere internet meme, the work turns its gaze toward the underlying social conditions that give it form.

The places where those who have drifted or been expelled from society's normal flow reside—those left outside the bounds of institution and order—have always been spaces of this kind: threshold spaces, spaces in between. Liminal space is at once an architectural reality and a topology of social exclusion. Through multi-channel video and sound, the work explores the ways in which these border spaces proliferate simultaneously across the internet and the physical world, asking how collective anxiety comes to crystallize into a particular spatial imaginary.

This work takes as its site the Culture Plaza of the Asia Culture Center in Gwangju—a space that, despite being built on the former site of the South Jeolla Provincial Office that served as a headquarters during the Gwangju Uprising, remains unable to accumulate shared memory or collective narrative. The artist interprets this open yet strangely disconnected plaza as a non-place in the sense proposed by Marc Augé: a space marked by the absence of relation, history, and identity.

The installation overwhelms the space with sound and video that pulse and divide between red and blue, white and black. Images that endlessly bifurcate yet never escape their binary axis evoke the logic of dichotomous thinking—conjuring the history of past conflict, the recurring divisions of the present, and the premonition of events yet to come. Through this, the artist transforms an abstract civic space into a site charged with historical and political affect.

Three Suns was presented at the 12th Gwangju Biennale.

Blind Land, 2016, 4 channel video with 8 channel audio, 9 minutes link : <https://vimeo.com/198661492>

In the language of real estate, maengji (盲地) refers to a plot of land entirely surrounded by other land, unreachable by any physical path or road. The artist extends this architectural and legal concept into the social realm. Is not the psychological space inhabited by those left outside institutional structures—those severed from networks of relation—also a kind of blind land?

The work brings together three speakers living in Seoul, Hong Kong, and Taiwan: cities that share certain histories while remaining distinctly apart. They are people who let others into their spaces, who leave certain places behind, or who find themselves facing the spaces left empty. Through narration, their voices move across the terrain of spatial occupation and ownership, the boundary between private and public space, and the narratives embedded in memory—summoning the psychological density that physical space quietly holds within it.

This artwork is inspired by the history and future potential of SeMA Bunker, a former underground bunker from Korea's modern history that now serves as an exhibition space. It metaphorically represents the various stories and materials related to this site as a "maze," and is based on the destiny of the space as a future "contemporary art exhibition venue. " Using archival materials, photographs, and documents related to the underground bunker, the artist has reimagined them through creative interpretation into new video and sound works.

Ambient Radio – Music To Space Out. 2020, live stream on internet, Link : <https://www.youtube.com/live/xRZw8hbtqal?si=JovGnDyj8Oj2Mb52>

This work was created for an online exhibition, originating from the experience of private space and social media becoming increasingly fused during the pandemic. Lockdowns and social distancing transformed individual rooms into offices, performance venues, and social spaces all at once, as screen-mediated connection became the sole form of public contact.

Rather than merely reflecting this condition, the work takes that condition itself as its structural logic. By choosing YouTube Live as its platform, the artist constructs a channel capable of intervening and infiltrating audiences scattered across different times and places simultaneously. Music and video composed and produced entirely by the artist play continuously from the artist's own computer, twenty-four hours a day—available for anyone to tune into and share in real time, at whatever moment they choose. This unceasing broadcast transforms the artist's private space into a space of public transmission, while simultaneously allowing the work to flow into the private space of each viewer.

24/7 Ambient Radio – Music To Space Out perpetually unsettles the boundaries between private and public, real-time and asynchronous, presence and absence—probing, through the forms of music and streaming, the topology of connection that the pandemic has fundamentally reorganized.

Reverb is a public sculpture by KIMeKIM, a collaboration between designer Jongbeom Kim and the artist.

It reflects the changing light, space, and presence of visitors at Gwangmyeong U Planet, creating a subtle echo of the environment. Installed along the escalator and corridor, the work offers a shifting sensory experience based on time and movement. Visitors can sit on nearby benches and listen to sounds that change with the seasons and throughout the day.

Walking Lullaby

Between 10 PM and 2 AM—when melatonin, crucial for brain development, is most actively released—I help my child fall asleep through gentle movements and soothing sounds: rocking, holding, tapping, pausing, and whispering lullabies.

Only after my child sleeps do I find time to create. The sound in this work is both a lullaby for my baby and a song that awakens the creator within me, who has been a caregiver all day.

The soundscape, composed of piano and synthesizer, flows through five speakers, shifting between calm and tension. The curved steel pipe installation is both a visual score of the sound and a drawing of my emotional rhythm—like a human cradle pacing a dark room with a child on the verge of sleep.

Scattering Lights Gliding Sounds

OpenFrameworks, Ableton live, Max for live, Opusmodus, DMX controller, weather API data
Dimensions variable

This artwork transforms real-time weather data from Seoul and Pyeongchang into light and sound signals on Seoulo 7017. Using temperature, wind, humidity, and sky conditions, it creates a daily harmony that connects the two cities. As people walk along Seoulo, their steps interact with the installation, turning the urban landscape into a shared sensory experience. Created in collaboration with artists Donghoon Lee and Hassan Hujairi, this piece was part of Signal Lights Connected, a public art project for the 2017 Pyeongchang Cultural Olympics curated by Gallery Factory.

Hundreds of square concrete blocks are stacked and layered to form an acoustic diffuser. As their orderly edges create elegant curves, stepping into the space called Yoonseul gradually silences the noise of Seoul Station's surroundings.

In this quiet, artist Kim Daum imagines a song shaping the human form. The interior of Yoonseul resembles the biological process of cell division and echoes the structure of a fugue—defined by imitation and repetition in music.

This is how Soft Body began. On a fugue-like melody, voices of a boy and girl articulate different organs. Their harmonies accumulate at the center of Yoonseul, gradually forming a human body.

Expiration Dates

 3 headphones, binaural recording, 3 signs, media player
 variable sizes

This work involves collecting and reediting sounds generated by the city and food culture to reveal auditory experiences and memories related to food. The artist pays attention to the expiration dates associated with food and uses them as a medium to create a sound installation. After gathering stories related to expiration dates, these narratives are reconstructed, allowing visitors to experience a sense of urgency through binaural field recordings at the exhibition venue.

2015

aluminum, transparent color film, media player, headphones, binaural sound
4.3 x 4.3 x 5 m

Audio Link: <https://vimeo.com/329270788>

This artwork is inspired by the 4.19 Pagoda in Hyeonwa, once a symbol of democracy protests in Korea. The government relocated the pagoda, and today, the area has transformed into shops and theaters. People still gather, but not for protests; instead, they shop, attend theaters, and watch movies. The installation features aluminum structures with colorful film, and viewers can wear headphones to hear lifelike sounds, as if they are in a crowd, recorded using a binaural microphone.

Mutually Mediated

2013, Single Channel HD Video with Sound, 10 minutes, link :<https://vimeo.com/71558178?share=copy>

Mutually Mediated summons the exhibition space as an interface. The work takes the form of a video in which the viewpoint penetrates a digital display and drifts slowly through a reconstructed virtual space. A narration moves alongside the camera, reflecting on the hierarchies of communication inherent in the act of viewing. Into this, the artist folds a figure encountered on social media, turning the work toward a central question: the (im)possibility of communication itself.

Mutually Mediated is a work about how contemporary life has come to be organized through the logic of the interface. Social media does not merely mediate our experience — it has come to precede and shape it. The interface is no longer a window onto daily life. It has become the structure of daily life itself.

Still Life: Radiolondres, 2013, Single channel HD video with stereo sound, 20 minutes link : <https://vimeo.com/61244363?share=copy>

Still Life: Radiolondres is a video work based on coded Twitter messages shared during the 2012 French presidential election. Due to legal restrictions. on sharing election data before polls closed, French voters used metaphors, jokes, and everyday objects to communicate results—transforming political d ata into poetic code.

The hashtag #radiolondres referenced WWII resistance broadcasts from London to occupied France. Messages like "Custard is expensive, the Rolex is sold off..." used nicknames and symbols to represent candidates and vote counts.

The artist was drawn to how these codes—though varied—were universally understood, blending private expression with collective meaning. The work explores how personal actions in a sociopolitical context can become shared "social objects."

On December 19, 2011, North Korea officially announced the death of Kim Jong-il. Over the course of approximately one hour before and after the official announcement, I captured around 30,000 tweets — a torrent of news reports, rumors, political commentary, jokes, grief, provocation, and memes, all colliding in the same stream.

Information, personal opinion, raw emotion, meme culture all blur into one another. This work reconstructs that stream as a single compressed object.
